Archaeological Excavations at the Black Friary in Trim, Ireland

never built over. In the last dozen years archaeological excavations revealed a complex series of uses for this site. Dr. Scott uses skeletal, archaeological, and historical data to discover how cultural and biological aspects of human life are intertwined. She will trace

In AD 1263 a Dominican friary was founded just north of the town wall in Trim, County Meath, Ireland. The Black Friary became a large, powerful institution in medieval Trim, but fell into ruin after it was dissolved by Henry VIII. Eventually it was used as both a quarry and site for unsanctified burials – but the 700-year history of the Black Friary, using this research to illuminate its long relationship with the town.
